

I have been a Quixtar/Amway IBO for 7 years. In that time, I have been active in building my business for a financial reward and inactive in building the business but have used the products and associated with other IBO's for personal improvement. Both were of my own choosing as a business owner and both were rewarding.

When I registered and when I register others, there is more than enough information given to read, look at, study and listen to, to make an informed decision. The materials can be easily reviewed in 24-48 hours. A seven day waiting period is not only unnecessary, it is unfair to those who want to get their business started immediately.

The cost of registration is less than $200. This includes products for you to try out/use. All of this is easily refundable if someone changes their mind. I have seen this first hand.

I don't think that it is necessary to have to give out references. In our weekly workshop where a prospect is required to see the full business plan prior to signing up, there are 50+ IBO's that he can easily talk to. Also during this workshop, there is the disclaimer that this is not a "get rich quick scheme", it requires hard work and the full FTC approved financial model is shown.

It would not enhance my business, nor would I feel comfortable giving personal information such as income statements, phone numbers, or other information to someone who is not yet a trusted member of the business team. A statement of the average income of an active IBO is given to every new prospect in the data for review.

Aside from overwhelming the new prospect with added inapplicable data, any lawsuits and their outcome are public records and can be researched if one is so inclined.

At last, I would ask you not to penalize the legitimate businesses, like Quixtar, for the ones who are illegitimate and scamming people. Do your investigation and shut down those businesses who wouldn't be honest enough to follow your rules, even if they were demanded. Those are the people who give the rest of us a bad name.

Thank you.
